

Potential Earnings Plays This Week

Last week we focused on the historical price moves of IBM, ISRG and GOOG following their past earnings reports to form trading strategies for their reports this quarter. All three of their reactions to earnings last Thursday tracked very similarly to their historical patterns, and on the following pages, we highlight companies reporting this week that have past results that stand out.

Potash (POT) is an agriculture stock that has become widely traded this year, and all three of its earnings reports in 2008 have had similar price reactions. In each report, the stock has traded higher in the pre-market and then sold off sharply from the open to the close. When the stock has gapped higher on earnings, its average change from the open to the close has been -1.34%. When it has gapped lower, however, it has averaged a gain of 0.80%. POT reports earnings before the open on Thursday, so keep this data in mind if you see the stock trading up or down in the pre-market. Continued on page two...

ITT Educations (ESI) has been one of the most consistently positive stocks on earnings in our Interactive Earnings Database. As shown below, the stock has beaten estimates 96% of the time since 2001. On average, the stock has gained 5.90% on the first trading day following its past reports. And even if you didn't hold the stock heading into earnings, buying it at the open when it has gapped higher has earned traders another 4.06% from the open to the close on average. For traders looking to play the odds, ESI usually does well on report days. But even if you want to wait and see if it can beat estimates again, buying after the initial gap still yields results. ESI reports on Thursday before the open.

Along with Apple, Amazon (AMZN) is one of the biggest tech companies reporting this week. AMZN is historically very volatile on earnings reports, and buying or shorting the stock prior to earnings is a hit or miss trade. When the company has missed estimates, it has averaged a decline of 15% on the day. When it has beaten estimates, it has averaged a gain of 6.45%. However, one trade that has worked out is buying it at the open if it gaps higher on earnings. Of the ten times that the stock has gapped higher on earnings since 2001 (shaded area), it has traded higher from the open to the close eight times for an average gain of 3.36%. If Amazon trades higher in the post market after reporting on Wednesday after the close, it may be worth a look on Thursday morning barring any macro market moving events that take precedence.

Apple (AAPL) is going to be the most watched stock on earnings this week. Below we highlight the stock's historical quarterly reports since 2001. Since '01, the stock has beaten estimates 85.7% of the time and averaged a gain of 1.46% on the day. When it has gapped lower, it has gone slightly lower from the open to the close. When it has gapped up at the open, it has gone slightly higher during regular trading. The stock has gapped down big ($17 and $19) on two of its last three report days, and both times investors bid the stock higher throughout the trading day. One interesting tidbit from our database is that the company has lowered guidance on 10 of its last 13 quarterly reports. Prior to 7/05, the company raised guidance for 7 reports in a row. Investors have gotten used to a negative outlook from Jobs and Co., so upbeat guidance this time around could be the key to a multi-day rally for the stock following its report tomorrow afternoon.
